This increase, say the "wets," paralleling as it does the increase in "dry" territory, proves that prohibition is not prohibiting, but merely making it hard to get beer, whereas whisky is to be had everywhere.

With this situation in mind it is in-teresting to speculate on the results that might follow various proposed pro-hibitory laws. The Hobson amendment is the most prominent among these. This amendment, if enacted, have destroyed the organized industry, but it would have allowed from 4 to 7, at the Ontario, to meet Mrs. every man to make his own liquor. George C. Gregory, of Richmond. This amendment confined itself to "the sale, manufacture for sale, importation visiting in Washington and is stopping sale, manufacture for sale, importation for sale, exportation for scie and transportation for sale of all beverages and all foods containing alcohol." There was no prohibition on manufacture, importation, exportation or transportation if the beverages or foods were not for sale. Every farmer would have for sale. Every farmer would have the amendment been adopting the amendment been adopting the same adopt distilleries and breweries purely because of the fact that government derives revenue from liquor production.

Prior to 1794 there was no tax on the making of liquor and every man who swished participated. But as good as wished participated. But as soon as an excise was placed on production the industry was forced to a commercial Every time the tax was increasbasis. Every time the tax was increased the industry was concentrated in fewer hands In fact the distillers are charged by some historians with having, themselves, brought about the increase in revenue tax from 50 cents a Charged with law and Charged with law and gallon in 1870 to $1.10 a gallon in 1898. As the increased revenue did not apply to whisky already made the distillers, it is said, gained just so much clear profit through the higher market price to which the increased tax forced the to which the increased tal low govern-article. Be this as it may, the govern-ment revenue machine has been a sort of tariff wall around the men already of tariff wall around distillers and brewers. As the consumer paid the tax the producer made just as much profit and he was relieved of a world of small competition. The revenue officers acted

If prohibitionary legislation forced he government to give up revenues rom liquor, government would have no further reason for seeking out and destroying stills. The whole preven-tion of manufacture would fall upon the local authorities. The flood of the local authorities. The flood of cheap liquor that would presumably follow—the best of whisky could be made for 25 cents a gallon were the tax removed—would undoubtedly ruin the present great distillers and brew-

Are of the individual still is shown by the fact that Illinois, which produced in the second largest produced in the last fiscal year 33,265,472 gallons of spirits, as against 19,073,089 for Indiana, the second largest producer, did so from just seven distilleries.

A recognition of this growth in moonshining involves several interesting considerations. The first of these found moonshining distributed equally throughout the United States we might, is as to its effect on the relative use of hear and which.
